Poetry.

From the Boston Journal.

Hurrah!

BY MISS A. HAYWARD.

[There is no need to mention what stirring events suggested these lines. The nation knows it from sea to sea and from shore to shore,

and every true heart rejoices in it.]

Hurrah for the hundred and thirty Kings!

(Change on the title, please.)

The bell of liberty loudly rings.

The land—our land—is free!

And the sovereigns sit in the Capitol,

Though not in the White House found;

They're the men whose fame will brightly glow

While the ages roll around.

Hurrah for the Kings who rule our land.

The people's men are they;

And they represent the brave, true hearts.

That fill Freedom's flag.

Oh, not in vain, for the land they loved,

Did our martyred patriots die.

While the Congress—Kings on their thrones

Female—

And keep our flag on high!

That flag that wafts, on land and sea,

Protection to the slave,

So lately taken by War's red hand

From out his living grasp.

Miscellaneous.

The Dead Letter.

CHAPTER X.

I was already so familiar with Mr. Burton's personal surroundings as to know that he was a widower, with two children; the eldest, a boy of fifteen, away at school; the second, a girl of eleven, of delicate health, and educated at home, so far as she studied at all, by a day-governess. I had never seen this daughter, Lenore, he called her,

but I could guess, without any doubt,

from her name, that she was a very delicate child. He could not mention her name without a glow coming into his face; her father's name appeared to be the anxiety of his life. I could hear her, now, taking a singing-lesson in a distant apartment, and as her pure voice rose clear and high,

mounting and mounting with airy steps
